Low-fi prototype Design Rationale

For the new page, I implemented a shopping cart page. I used a two-column layout, where the left side displays all the selected item by the users, and the right side displays the total cost and an action button that says "check out".

I also made edits to the existing details page. Before the details page is static, and the users are only able to check out the product descriptions, glazing options and ingredients details. In order for users to add the item to their shopping cart from the details page, I utilized radio buttons to allow users select their glazing options. I also added a row with quantity options so that users can choose the number of cinnamon rolls they want.
